The Oregon State Law Enforcement Accountability Commission (SLEAC), which was created by House Bill 2274 in 2007, was authorized to oversee compliance with the new laws. For the most part, the new law is a re-branding of the disbanded Oregon Department of Justice (ODJ). The new authority to investigate and prosecute corruption and money laundering is the job of the Oregon State Police and District Attorneys Office. SLEAC can offer consulting and expertise to the District Attorney when they feel it is needed, however. When it was formed the Oregon Department of Justice was responsible for chasing down investigative leads, prosecuting and convicting corrupt cops and prosecutors. It was created in May of 2007 by the Whitman administration. In 2009, Congress forced the hiring of over 300 attorneys, investigators and support staff, leaving the Oregon Department of Justice with just over half the staff that existed prior to the legislation. The Oregon Legislature was quite concerned that the corruption problem was increasing. Governor Kitzhaber and the Legislature were concerned that the corruption problem was growing and that the Oregon Department of Justice was not equipped to handle this issue. At the time the current corruption problem was starting to become more of a problem, a bill was introduced in the Legislature to create an "anti-corruption agency". It was also known as the Oregon Public Integrity Program, which was sponsored by Representative Floyd Prozanski. However, it was later known as Senate Bill 447. Senate Bill 447 was passed by the Senate on March 10, 2007, and by the House on March 20, 2007, in a bipartisan vote of 67-0. The new agency would have three components. An Administrative Unit, Enforcement Unit, and a Support Services Unit. The bipartisan sponsors of the bill, Prozanski and Representative Steve
