Previous studies have suggested that growth factors and cytokines affect cultured vascular endothelial cells from a variety of tissues and organs in different ways. In this study we compared the responses of four vascular endothelial cell types to two cytokines (IL-1 beta and IL-2) and two growth factors (TGF beta and PDGF). Although the four cell types shared common growth characteristics, there were subtle, but significant differences in their responses to these cytokines and growth factors. The results showed that the responses of endothelial cells to IL-1 beta and IL-2 were cell type-specific, reflecting developmental and functional differences between these cell types. For example, IL-1 beta induced the expression of the adhesion molecule ICAM-1 in human umbilical vein endothelial cells but not in bovine pulmonary artery endothelial cells. In addition, different receptors for IL-2 were present on the various endothelial cell types. Growth response characteristics of the four cell types were also different in that: (a) the IL-1 beta-induced growth of 595f342e71
